“ I worked with John in the last couple decades of his career and mine. He was a good salesman, always searching for the way to make a sale that his competitors hadn't thought of. I went with him many times on sales calls. One of the first was to a big company which I had gone to with two other salesmen over a span of years, every time without success.

John knew his products inside out, and he explained, non-stop, all the benefits of dealing with our product and our company. He promised A. He promised B, and so on. When John got to F or G, the customer perked up. He said, "You can do that?" It was as though clouds parted and a bright light shown forth for the first time. John got the sale.

He was a good man, he liked everybody and offered empathy and friendship to all. God bless him and his family.

“ I first met John in 1975 and we worked together for 25 years. In business, John was his own person - outgoing, self confident, a hard driver, an achiever, someone I could count on for help or advice, and one who's word actually meant something. In life, the John that I knew loved life. He loved adventure, anything to do with the outdoor side of living. He could be demanding (mostly of himself) and a little impulsive, but he also had a kinder and generous side. John never met a stranger - he was always easy to talk with and never hesitated to share his thoughts and opinions.

Of all of these memories about John, the one that I will always hold closest to my heart is that he was my friend. John will be missed by me - but he will never be forgotten. He will live on in my memories forever.

My prayers are with Gage and John's family.
